𐎠𐎵

Rambert, JCS 11,5-7

Column I.

Column II.

Column I contains a list of names in Akkadian and Sumerian script, arranged in vertical columns. The text is partially obscured by a large, irregularly shaped area of diagonal hatching on the left side, which covers approximately the first 15 columns of the list. The remaining text is organized into several distinct sections, with some lines containing multiple columns of script. The script is dense and characteristic of ancient Mesopotamian cuneiform.

Column II contains a list of names in Akkadian and Sumerian script, arranged in vertical columns. This column is also partially obscured by diagonal hatching on the right side, covering approximately the last 15 columns of the list. The text is organized into several distinct sections, with some lines containing multiple columns of script. The script is dense and characteristic of ancient Mesopotamian cuneiform.

Column IV.

Column III.

Column IV contains a list of names in Akkadian and Sumerian script, arranged in vertical columns. This column is partially obscured by diagonal hatching on the left side, covering approximately the first 15 columns of the list. The remaining text is organized into several distinct sections, with some lines containing multiple columns of script. The script is dense and characteristic of ancient Mesopotamian cuneiform.

Column III contains a list of names in Akkadian and Sumerian script, arranged in vertical columns. This column is partially obscured by diagonal hatching on the right side, covering approximately the last 15 columns of the list. The remaining text is organized into several distinct sections, with some lines containing multiple columns of script. The script is dense and characteristic of ancient Mesopotamian cuneiform.
